WHAT LOVE IS. According to the Poeters of Passion is

Comprehends Everything,
Ella Wheder Wiles.
Love is the center and circumference.
The cause and aim of all things; 'tis the key
To joy and sorrow, and the recompenso
For all the ills that have been or may be.

Love is as blitter as the dregs of sin,
As sweet as clover-honey in its cell.
Love is the password whereby souls get in To heaven—the gate that leads sometimes to hell.

Love is the crown that glorifles, the curse
That brands and burdens. It is life and death.
It is the great law of the universe.
And nothing can exist without its breath.

Love is the impulse which directs the world, And all things know it and obey its power. Man in the macistrom of his passions whirled; The bee that takes the pollen to the flower;

The earth uplifting her bore, pulsing breast To fervent kisses of the amorous sun— Each but obeys creative Love's behest, Which everywhere instinctively is done. Love is the only thing that pays for birth, Or makes death welcome. Oh, dear God

POOR "CARMEN SYLVA."

The Poet Queen of Roumania in Her Exile

at Venice. The most extraordinary stories are current in the European press about the condition of the queen of Roumania and her domestic relations, says the Philadelphia Press. Most of them, of course, are devoid of even the slightest foundation. Some scribblers have not hesitated to hint that she has been guilty of all sorts of crimes, and the de-lay of the king in joining her in Venice encouraged them to further feats of inencouraged them to further feats of in-vention. The real cause of the king's delay in joining his wife was the pres-ence there of Mile. Vacarosco, who, until recently, would listen to no in-ducement to leave her royal mistress. The most conflicting statements are printed about the queen's health, and only undisputed fact appears to be that she is very hysterical and in a wretched condition, caused partly by anxiety. condition, caused partly by anxiety, partly by some kind of spinal trouble. Both she and her husband are the center of a great variety of selfish and un-scrupulous intrigue, which, it is thought, may yet result in the king's ought, may yet reason these autumn Could one be in Venezia these autumn Could one be in venezia these autumn days, twisting and turning through her narrow canals or gliding over the blue waters of the Adriatic, one might meet now and again a solitary gondola, black, the currains half drawn, slowly washing the mean the growds of making its way among the crowds of other boats.

Inside there might be seen reclining on the cushions, resting her head on her hand, and looking out to an unquiet past and perhaps a still more troubled future, a pale-faced woman, with an indomitable spirit looking out of her rather cold eyes, and yet with just a hint of despair in the lines around her mouth. She seems to see nothing, and yet to know eyerything that is passing around her. She is beautiful with the kind of beauty that repels. Inside there might be seen reclining repels.

The interior of the gondola is dark and dim, but if one see in far enough another person will appear. This woman is tall and also pale. She is strikingly handsome and distinguished looking. Albeit a little languid in manner, she pays assiduous attention to the woman on the cushions, and anticipates her slightest desire.

Here and there the gondola stops before some old curiosity shop, and the two alighting and entering shortly come out laden with old china or moth-oaten tapestry, or with some of the thousand tapestry, or with some of the thousand and one things dear to the bric-a-brac lover. Then the woman with the lines of despair about her mouth settles down again upon the cushions and looks again far away. This woman is Elizabeth of Roumania.

This is Carmen Sylva, the poetess of whom all Europe has been talking, and whom all Europe has been talking, and whose quarrel with her husband, coupled with its romance, has stirred up royalty generally. The woman with her is none other than Mile. Vacaresco, her maid of honor, and who was the innocent cause of the trouble between the king and queen of Roumania.

The story of this affair has been to some extent told, and is rather romantic. When Ferdinand, the heir to the throne of Roumania and a distant relative of King Charles, fell in love with the queen's maid of honor, and when the maid of honor fell in love with Ferdinand, Carmen Sylva forgot that policy rules royal marriages as well as

When Ferdinand, the heir to the throne of Roumania and a distant relative of King Charles, fell in love with the queen's maid of honor, and when the maid of honor fell in love with Ferdinand, Carmen Sylva forgot that policy rules royal marriages as well as royal politics and constantly fanned the flames of love. So successful were her efforts that, though Cupid hardly needed them, the story of the courtship spread all through Europe. Then the king's advisers took an oar and speedily steered the frail love boat upon the rocks. "Never," said they, "must this marriage take place." So Ferdinand was sent on a journey to find another bride and his course was rough, indeed. Then the cables began to whisper stories of the queen's insanity. Nothing so definite as that was ever openly alleged, but the hints were enough to show that she was mentally unbalanced. The courtiers and ministers of King Charles openly advised him to divorce his wife somenly advised him to divorce his wife somenly advised him to divorce his wife.

definite as that was ever openly alleged, but the hints were enough to show that she was mentally unbalanced. The courtiers and ministers of King Charles openly advised him to divorce his wife, but this he emphatically refused to do. "I will not," said he, "do such a dishonorable thing as that. She will still remain my wife."

The poetess queen has always had a will and a temper of her own. As a royal poetess, too, she may have been a little spoiled. At any rate she was less considerate of the feelings of her royal spouse than he had been of hers. She threatened that if she could not have her way she would leave her husband, and she did leave him, and that is why she is sulking in Venezia. The stories now are that King Charles is himself to go to Venezia and take his truant wife home, the beautiful maid of honor being willing to leave the poetess queen and so aid in solving the difficulty.

home, the beautiful maid of honor being willing to leave the poetess queen and so aid in solving the difficulty.

[She has since been taken from Venice by her husband.]

There is no probability that she is insane. Always of an excitable and imaginative nature, she has simply worn out her nervous system. Her brain is still unaffected. The wide-spread great over her peoper has also brain is still unmeeted. The wide-spread craze over her poems has also had its effect. No one supposed that they would have attracted extraordinary attention, but for the name attached to them and the personality behind the-name. The furor they occasioned was the furor of any fad, and it is dying away.

The play recently produced in Venezia anonymously, but which was really from the pen of Carmen Sylva, fell flat. There was nothing in it. The echoes of the plaudits which the Queen received in Wales are dying away. One will not be likely to hear of Carmen Sylva much after this.
